JOB MARKET PAPER

Make me believe. Self-efficacy and human capital investments among young women in Ghana.

Development programs focus on addressing external constraints such as limited access to education, credit, social protection, or infrastructure. However, many programs see low participation, even among those eligible or initially registered. Recent evidence suggests that internal, psychological constraints may suboptimally affect employment and investment decisions. In Ghana, I examine whether a randomized video- and message-based testimonial campaign designed to boost self-efficacy as one potential internal constraint can increase participation in a training program that minimized external constraints as much as possible. The testimonials raised self-efficacy to a magnitude comparable to intensive face-to-face interventions and improved training participation among those who started. Effects were driven by better training performance and changes in participant composition. In line with theory, effects are concentrated among women with medium baseline education and low initial self-efficacy levels.
